PNG after the Elections: Reimagining the future by reflecting on the past.

FIONA HUKUA

Morning olgeta, firstly may I take this opportunity to thank the UPNG (the school of Business Administration and Public Policy and the Crawford School of Public Policy, ANU for providing me this opportunity to share some thoughts today. As Prof Pillai mentioned, I am the Program leader of the Building Safer Communities at the PNGNRI. I also oversee the Gender in PNG research program with my colleague Dr Elizabeth Kopel.

Today I would like to share some thoughts on PNG after the elections. My reflections are based on nearly twenty years’ experience as a researcher. It has been a little over a week since PNG’s 10th National Parliament convened. The last three months has been a busy time for election officials, media and security personnel. In some places elections have been relatively peaceful. People voted and life carried on but in other parts of the country violence and the unnecessary and unfortunate loss of lives has marred elections. My observation of media reports and preliminary findings from research into women and elections in Morobe by my colleagues Mary Fairio and Sarah Kaut-Nasengom reveals that the flawed electoral rolls have led to great disappointment by many people who have not been able to cast their votes.

In terms of international agenda, the APEC 2018 meeting is a key event that will happen in the future. At the national level, the Bougainville referendum will be an important event for Papua New Guinea as the outcome of the referendum will not only dictate the political future of Bougainville and PNG but it will also set a precedent for those provinces advocating for autonomy.

Unfortunately for the next 5 years, we shall not be seeing any women on the floor of parliament. Yesterday, in her inaugural address the United States Ambassador, Mrs Catherine Egbert-Grey stated that the fact that we have no women in parliament should be of grave concern. While this is a depressing outcome of the elections it also clearly indicates the need to reassess and re-strategise on how we think about this issue.

I also think we need to look at the bigger picture as well. In analysing the performance of some of the women who came in the top three places of the election, we can see that women are receiving votes, for example Delilah Gore led in the first preference votes and the second preference votes. She lost by just over 200 votes on the last elimination.

In terms of reflecting on how to get women in to parliament, the experiences of women candidates are crucial and addition to that the experiences of former female parliamentarians is also important because while we may not have women in parliament now, we do know from experience that women can be voted in to parliament and on more than one occasion. For example, Mrs Nahau Rooney, Dame Josephine Abaijah and Dame Carol Kidu were all elected into parliament more than once, so we know from the past that we can elect women into parliament, it is getting women into parliament at every election that is the challenge.

We also know that women are leaders in their communities. In my experience of researching both in urban and rural communities, everywhere I have worked, women leaders always turn up when research meetings are organised and they articulate their concerns clearly. The leadership capabilities of women at the local level is evident as we know from the last local level government elections, forty-five women were voted into local government of which a couple of them were Town Mayors.

As Papua New Guineans, we need to ask ourselves the hard questions such as, should we be talking about getting women in parliament in terms of gender equality and participation or should we be talking about what makes a good leader? Also, when we talk about getting women into parliament, are we using the right language when addressing different audiences.

Getting women into parliament is not only about discussing in forums like this but in my view, it is also about trying our best to understand the ways in which our people think about gender. I make this comment because often this issue is viewed as a western agenda, maybe because we use words and definitions that are not familiar to the majority of our people. But if we look back to the Constitutional Planning Committee report of 1974 we see that this was something that our leaders clearly thought about and if we take off the western gender lens which we often use to have these discussions and start to unpack gender relations in a way that allows us to see the world view of our people we will start to map a way forward that is inclusive of everyone.

A lot of the debate around having women in parliament is hinged on the idea of gender equality and equal participation in the development of this country. We use this word development but what does it mean to different communities? For some it means access to good roads so they can sell their cocoa and coffee and access health care. For others, it may mean access to clean water and sanitation, for some it may mean four lane highways and a mall. This one word can trigger discussions about all kinds of things and ways that we imagine development and our future to be.

As a country, we have created some great plans and launched many policies and programs in different sectors with the future in mind and with development in mind. Many of our plans and strategies are anchored in the National Goals and Directive Principles. But how many of us know the National Goals and Directive Principles? I must admit that I am not that well versed with the National Goals and Directive Principles but sometimes when I read things about how we treat each other as Papua New Guineans or how different people imagine their future and especially when I see the growing inequalities between our people I go back and try to acquaint myself better with the National Goals and Directive Principals.

I also like to every now and then read bits and pieces of the CPC report just to remind myself of what the members of the CPC imagined our future to be. As a researcher whose work is now mostly in the urban there are two statements from the CPC which I often read. I will only read the first part here of paragraph 116 here:
We see the darkness of neon lights, we see the despair and loneliness in urban cities. We see the alienation from man that is the result of the present machine oriented economy. We see true social security and man’s happiness being diminished in the name of economic progress. When I read this, I can see that the future was predicted accurately but then two paragraphs later the CPC report states

Our ways emphasise community. We exercise our rights in the context of our obligations to our community. This sentence alone gives me some sense of hope because yes in the urban context we are now seeing increased poverty in our cities but also in my experience of growing up in this city, of living in an urban settlement as part of my PhD and of my more recent research with urban village courts I can see that we still hold firm many of these traits which we call our Papua New Guinean ways. In the urban setting, we exercise these ideals by doing kinship through our street, church, sporting and work communities and it is through this sense of belonging that we need to start to address the many social issues that we face as a nation, this includes our high rates of violence, gender based violence (not just domestic violence but sorcery related accusation violence which many of our people suffer from) and child abuse. For when we start to harness the positive things about who we as people from different provinces and regions we will build a better future for our children and their children.

Finally, my call today to you as my fellow academics, policy makers and students is to start to decolonise the way we think about development, lets strive to understand our people better instead of resorting to calling ourselves uncivilised and uneducated when our people fail to understand concepts and words that are not in their vernacular. Instead let’s build on our strengths and work towards localising global concepts such as the SDG’s, so that we can meet our international commitments but also so that we see the change what we want to see in our country.

Once again thank you to the organisers of PNG Update 2017 for giving me this opportunity to share my thoughts. I wish you all a good day.
