

Illustration: Andrew Dyson

Bigger IS richer: Hugh White responds to Stephen Howes

By Hugh White
3 August 2011

Is Indonesia a richer country than Australia? I think it is because its GDP – in PPP terms – is larger than Australia's. Stephen Howes disagrees. His post makes a very good point about how low per capita GDP remains in Indonesia and other booming economies – much lower than in Australia. But at the risk of seeming to split hairs, I think that tells us that Indonesians as individuals are not richer than Australians. It does not mean that Indonesia is not richer than Australia as a country.

So which matters more – individual wealth or aggregate national wealth? Of course it depends on what we are trying to measure. Per capita GDP is more important when we are measuring individual welfare, and of course that counts. But national wealth is important when we are interested in the capacity of a country to achieve national goals. In my line of work – defence – it is important as a measure of the country's capacity to build armed forces. But it also helps us understand a country's capacity to fund other national priorities – including, for example, education.

My piece in The Age a couple of weeks ago that prompted Stephen's reply mentioned the Indonesia school program. My point was that Indonesia is wealthy enough as a country to build schools for itself, so out funding for schools simply diverts Indonesia's own spending to another, presumably lower, priority.

More deeply, I think the point about relative levels of national wealth is important in the way Australia sees itself in relation to our neighbours. I think most Australians still see Australia as a rich country surrounded by poor countries – and as a strong country surrounded by weak countries. It has always been that way. Now that is changing. The shift in relative economic weight and therefore national power away from us and towards our neighbours is a major change in our national situation which we are reluctant to face.

Just as Americans seem to be reluctant to address the implications of the shift in relative power to China, we are reluctant to address the implications of the shift in relative power from us to Indonesia. Of course Indonesians will be poorer than Australians for a long time to come, but Indonesia will be richer, and on some critical measures more powerful, than we are.

That is not to say that Indonesia becomes threatening, but it is to say that we have to start taking it a lot more seriously. We need to stop seeing it as a country notable mostly for its poverty, and stop seeing our relationship to it primarily as that of a rich donor helping a poor neighbour – as an object of our charity. We need to start seeing it as a country notable for its strength, and relate to it as an important partner in regional affairs.

Hugh White is Professor of Strategic Studies and Head of the Strategic and Defence Studies Centre at ANU, and a Visiting Fellow at the Lowy Institute for International Policy.

About the author/s

Hugh White

Hugh White is Professor of Strategic Studies and Head of the Strategic and Defence Studies Centre at ANU, and a Visiting Fellow at the Lowy Institute for International Policy.

Link: <https://devpolicy.org/bigger-is-richer-hugh-white-responds-to-stephen-howes-20110803/>

Date downloaded: 19 March 2024

Australian National University

The Devpolicy Blog is based at the Development Policy Centre, Crawford School of Public Policy, College of Asia and the Pacific, Australian National University.