Fortnightly links: humanitarian aid vs ice cream, DFID’s new strategy, cholera, and more

By Camilla Burkot and Terence Wood

Does the world really spend more than three times as much on ice cream each year as it does on humanitarian assistance? The BBC’s More or Less team have a look at this factoid and conclude it’s basically correct. Note though, that this is for humanitarian assistance, not all ODA. A comparison of More or Less’s number for ice cream consumption, and OECD data, shows that the world doesn’t spend three times more on ice cream than it does on ODA, but it does spend more. Depressing.

Lisa Denney from ODI looks at likely consequences of the Global Gag Rule, with some horrifying anecdotes from her fieldwork in Sierra Leone.

Also at ODI Dirk Willem te Velde discusses DfID’s new international development strategy. And David Booth celebrates the same document, alongside the new World Development Report ‘Governance and the Law’. Plenty of useful food for thought for Australia here.

This excellent multimedia feature from the New York Times looks at the emergence of cholera in Bangladesh — and the promise of a new, cheap and effective cholera vaccine developed and now manufactured in that country too.

Michael Edwards has a great piece musing on the future of advocacy oriented NGOs.
About the author/s

Camilla Burkot
Camilla Burkot was a Research Officer at the Development Policy Centre, and Editor of the Devpolicy Blog, from 2015 to 2017. She has a background in social anthropology and holds a Master of Public Health from Columbia University, and has field experience in Eastern and Southern Africa, and PNG. She now works for the Burnet Institute.

Terence Wood
Terence Wood is a Research Fellow at the Development Policy Centre. His research focuses on political governance in Western Melanesia, and Australian and New Zealand aid.