

Trump's new deal for international organisations: 40% off

By Robin Davies
30 January 2017

The New York Times reports that the Trump administration has set in train processes that could lead to the cancellation of US funding for some international organisations (beyond the already-defunded UNESCO) and a huge reduction in funding for the rest.

This is based on what it says is a leaked draft of an executive order which, if signed, would trigger an audit of US funding for international organisations and a search for savings of at least 40% across the board, in addition to savings harvested from completely defunded organisations.

On the basis of the most recent data on US contributions to the main major multilateral organisations, funds and programmes, I calculate that the US paid some US$11.1 billion into the multilateral system in 2015, not counting peacekeeping expenditure. Of this, US$6.8 billion went to UN agencies.

Contributions to the top 25 recipients of US funding to international organisations, each of which received at least US$35 million in 2015, are shown in the chart below.

US funding for international organisations, 2015

Data from US Congressional Research Service reports RS20792 and RS21128; UN document A/71/583; ICRC Annual Report, 2015; web sites of the Global Fund, Gavi and the OECD. Figures for the OECD are estimates only as the available information is imprecise. Contributions to multilateral development banks pursuant to General Capital Increases are treated here as assessed contributions. The ICRC, while not an intergovernmental organisation, is conventionally regarded as an international organisation.

Of the organisations shown above, it must be assumed that those most likely to be in the firing line are the Climate Investment Funds (and their successor, which does not appear above, the Green Climate Fund), the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East, the Global Environment Facility, the International Labour Organisation, the UN Population Fund (obviously) and the UN Environment Programme. The UN secretariat itself could also be in trouble.

Total US contributions to these most at-risk organisations were US$1.6 billion in 2015, of which just under half were voluntary contributions. This suggests that even a very aggressive pruning of contributions to these organisations would yield less than US$1 billion in savings. An overall funding reduction of 40%, however, would require savings of some US$4.5 billion to be found.

The Trump administration will probably be disinclined to reduce contributions to multilateral development banks to any great extent (the US Treasury would certainly counsel against this). Likewise, the two 'vertical' funds for health—the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria and Gavi, the Vaccine Alliance—have stories and constituencies so strong that they are likely to go relatively unscathed. Thus there could be correspondingly greater pressure on the UN system, which got about 18% of its non-peacekeeping income from the US in 2015.

The Trump administration probably won't want to bite deeply into those UN organisations traditionally headed by US appointees or instrumental in the achievement of US economic and security policy goals (the World Food Programme, the UN Children's Fund and the International Organisation for Migration). The pressure on the other UN organisations could, therefore, be quite intense. The International Committee of the Red Cross, to which the US allocates funding on a year to year basis, might also look like a soft target.

However, the contribution pool that remains after passing by, or only lightly shaving, the multilateral development banks, the vertical funds for health and the US-led organisations is, based on the 2015 numbers, about US$4.5 billion. That's the same as the amount that, according to the draft executive order, is to be saved.

Something has to give. Either 40% becomes more like 4%, or some major international organisations, most notably UN agencies such as the UN Refugee Agency, the World Health Organisation, the UN Development Programme and the Food and Agriculture Organisation, must begin to contemplate the near-disappearance of their first- or second-largest contributor. (For the record, Russia paid about US$220 million into the whole UN system in 2015.)

Robin Davies is Associate Director of the Development Policy Centre.

About the author/s

Robin Davies

Robin Davies is an Honorary Professor at the ANU's Crawford School of Public Policy and an editor of the Devpolicy Blog. He headed the Indo-Pacific Centre for Health Security and later the Global Health Division at Australia's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (DFAT) from 2017 until early 2023 and worked in senior roles at AusAID until 2012, with postings in Paris and Jakarta. From 2013 to 2017, he was the Associate Director of the Development Policy Centre.

Link: <https://devpolicy.org/trumps-new-deal-international-organisations-20170130/>

Date downloaded: 17 April 2024

Australian National University

The Devpolicy Blog is based at the Development Policy Centre, Crawford School of Public Policy, College of Asia and the Pacific, Australian National University.