

US food aid reform rejected by House of Reps

By Ashlee Betteridge
25 June 2013

The US food aid reforms, which I wrote on in this earlier piece for the blog, were rejected by the House of Representatives on Wednesday last week.

The NGO and aid communities have expressed disappointment at the decision. The reforms had earlier been praised by the sector for the improvements to cost effectiveness, humanitarian response and food delivery times that they would bring.

The reforms aimed to reduce the percentage of food aid that needed to be purchased from US producers and to end the 'monetisation' scheme, where charities and NGOs receive US produce to sell in developing countries so that the proceeds, in local currencies, can be used for aid projects.

Amid the pessimism following the defeat of the bill, Oxfam America's Gawain Kripke has written on some of the positive outcomes this time around from the campaign. He sees getting the bill to a vote as a major achievement for those who have already been advocating for food aid reform for some time.

About the author/s

Ashlee Betteridge

Ashlee Betteridge was the Manager of the Development Policy Centre until April 2021. She was previously a Research Officer at the centre from 2013-2017. A former journalist, she holds a Master of Public Policy (Development Policy) from ANU and has development experience in Indonesia and Timor-Leste. She now has her own consultancy, Better Things Consulting, and works across several large projects with managing contractors.

Link: <https://devpolicy.org/us-food-aid-reform-rejected-by-house-of-reps-20130625-1/>

Date downloaded: 20 April 2024

Australian
National University

The Devpolicy Blog is based at the Development Policy Centre, Crawford School of Public Policy, College of Asia and the Pacific, Australian National University.