

Weekend links: Malawi, PNG, graduating from poverty, remittances, hazard pay for Ebola workers, and the legacy of slavery

By Camilla Burkot and Terence Wood
22 May 2015

In an interview with the Guardian, Africa's first female ex-president, Malawi's Joyce Banda, insists that gender played only a minor role in her rapid ascent to the presidency. She also discusses her efforts to address the systemic corruption and misappropriation of £154 million of aid money (corruption which led to donors freezing direct aid to Malawi, at a time when it made up 40% of the national budget).

Systemic corruption is also pointed to in an article published this week by Al-Jazeera America on the TB epidemic in Papua New Guinea, and Médecins sans Frontières' efforts to contain it in Gulf Province. The piece illustrates the weak reach of the state into places like Kerema Hospital, despite PNG's expanding economy.

What helps the ultra poor? New research conducted in six countries in Africa, Latin America and South Asia, incorporating 10,500 households, tested a 'Graduation' program designed to help generate sustainable and lasting improvements in economic and social well-being. The study provides clear evidence that the package of interventions resulted in improvements across a range of development indicators including income and household consumption, although the authors caution that the magnitude of the improvements was often modest. (You can also read a short reader-friendly summary of the study here).

Another important source of income for the poor in many parts of the world is remittances. Nepal is one such country, which normally receives approximately US$500 million per month. Given the huge influx of remittances being sent to the country in the aftermath of the earthquakes, it is heartening to read that a number of money transfer services have waived transaction fees to send money to Nepal. However, this contrasts with the disappointing news that Kenya has cracked down on the movement of funds to and from Somalia, which is among the most remittance-reliant countries in the world.

Also related to the movement of money is Newsweek's investigative report on the (literal) short-changing of local health workers who participated in the Ebola response in Liberia. In addition to highlighting the injustice experienced by those who were on the frontline of the epidemic, the piece offers a biting critique of the international humanitarian relief system and half-hearted health systems strengthening efforts.

In light of the evidently failed coup in Burundi last week, a review of the consequences of coups in Africa is salient. As reported on the Washington Post's Monkey Cage blog, it seems that coups in African states are about as likely to result in democratic elections as they are to result in prolonged military rule. Structural factors and dominant trade partners, political path dependency, and complex internal politics (particularly within military forces) all play a role.

Finally, this essay on the legacy of slavery in Senegal is an elegant reminder of how historical events and relationships can continue to profoundly influence contemporary livelihoods and well-being.

About the author/s

Camilla Burkot

Camilla Burkot was a Research Officer at the Development Policy Centre, and Editor of the Devpolicy Blog, from 2015 to 2017. She has a background in social anthropology and holds a Master of Public Health from Columbia University, and has field experience in Eastern and Southern Africa, and PNG. She now works for the Burnet Institute.

Terence Wood

Terence Wood is a Fellow at the Development Policy Centre. His research focuses on political governance in Western Melanesia, and Australian and New Zealand aid.

Link:

<https://devpolicy.org/weekend-links-malawi-png-graduating-from-poverty-remittances-hazard-pay-for-ebola-workers-and-the-legacy-of-slavery/>

Date downloaded: 23 April 2024

Australian National University

The Devpolicy Blog is based at the Development Policy Centre, Crawford School of Public Policy, College of Asia and the Pacific, Australian National University.