

The new government and aid: our analysis

A new government always brings change, including to the aid program.

The Coalition's announcement less than 48 hours before the election that it would be holding aid flat after inflation at slightly below last year's level came as a surprise to many, including us. The additional surprise move to integrate AusAID into the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, amid a wider shake-up of the public service, has also raised many questions about Australian aid and its future priorities.

The decision brings to an end a decade of aid expansion. We've focused particularly on the decision to cut $656 million from this year's budget, below last year's level even before inflation. Within-year cuts of this magnitude are unprecedented; Robin Davies argues that cuts of this order within the current year will take the aid program from expansion to crisis. Stephen Howes suggests that with some parts of the aid program committed or protected, other parts will have to be cut by up to 20% on average.

While information is still limited on what an 'integration' into DFAT really means for AusAID, Robin Davies has also written on how it should be implemented to minimise damage to the aid program.

Over time, we'll be examining the longer-term implications of this shift. Ben Day has started this discussion arguing that Australia is now embarking on an aid course charted by New Zealand, Canada and the Netherlands, all of whom have cut aid and redefined its objective in more commercial terms. Terence Wood and Joanna Spratt have also provided a Kiwi perspective.

We've compiled the links to our analysis and our comments in the media below.
