

The 'unquantifiable cost' of the PNG asylum deal

Author : Ashlee Betteridge

Date : July 24, 2013

While there has been much talk on the role of aid as the bargaining chip in the PNG asylum seeker arrangement, Rowan Callick from The Australian perhaps best hit the nail on the head in describing the true costs of the deal, not to Australia but to PNG.

"It is the unquantifiable cost of having the nation of PNG presented as a place that is sufficiently unattractive that it can act as a deterrent even to people desperate to flee their home countries," Callick wrote.

Deni ToKunai also wrote for Lowy Interpreter on the damage that the deal has done for Australia's reputation in PNG.

In further developments, Manus Island MP Ronnie Knight told the 7.30 Report that it would likely take a further two years to complete permanent facilities on Manus, confirming Stephen Howes' analysis that time lags will weaken the credibility of the PNG deal. MP Knight also indicated that the proposed site for the facility would be contentious because it was too close to an urban area.

The Solomon Islands government may also talk about hosting offshore detention centres during Foreign Minister Bob Carr's visit this week.